

Living Trusts

What is a living trust?

A living trust is one way to manage your property. You get the full benefits while you are alive, but it lets you pass your property to your loved ones (or charities) after your death without having to go to probate.

A living trust is set up during your life. Most of the trust property is transferred into the trust while you are still living. When you die, the property transfers to your beneficiaries.

Remember, a living trust only covers the property put into it. You still need a will if you have any assets that are not put into the trust.

There are 2 kinds of Living Trusts

- An irrevocable trust cannot be changed or ended after it is signed.
- A revocable trust can be changed or ended at any time, as long as you are still competent.

What should I do before setting up a living trust?

It is always best to talk to a lawyer who can help you decide if a living trust is right for you. If you decide to set up a living trust, the lawyer can draw up the papers to make sure it fit your needs. Then the lawyer can help you put the property in the trust. A one-size-fits-all trust form may not help you.

What about buying a living trust package?

Beware of anyone who pressures you to buy a living trust package. Do not deal with anyone who wants you to sign something right away or to pay money before you have a chance to do more research. Some companies only want to sell their pre-packaged plans. They don't care how well the plan meets your needs. If a do-it-yourself trust is not done right, it can cause problems that cost money to fix.

It's possible to make a basic living trust on your own. Make sure you do a lot of research so you can do it right. There are self-help books and software programs to help. There are also many ways to do an online document with instructions and forms. Many of these are free.

But, if you have questions or if your situation is at all complicated, it's always best to talk to a lawyer.

So how does it work?

Basically, you make or set up a trust by signing a trust agreement. The agreement must be signed by:

- the person whose money and property will be managed by the trust (the Settlor - you) and
- the person who will be managing the trust (the Trustee).

The trustee must follow the directions you put in the trust papers. The trustee also has to follow the law about managing the property.

Then you transfer ownership and control of your property to the trust. The people who get the benefits now and the people who get your property after you die are called beneficiaries. You are the beneficiary while you are alive.

Some people want a living trust as a way to avoid probate or avoid making a will. Be careful! Trusts are confusing and you should think about it carefully and get legal advice.

More about settlors, trustees and beneficiaries

In a typical living trust, you would be the settlor, the trustee, and a beneficiary. This just means that it is your property, and you manage it while you are alive. When you die, the property is given out to the other beneficiaries that you named in the trust.

Note: You do not have to be the trustee. The trustee can be another person or a financial company, like a bank. You should appoint an alternate trustee to take over when you can't manage the trust anymore and when you die. If you don't appoint someone to take over, then a court gets involved –that is expensive and may not be what you want!

Can a living trust avoid probate?

Yes. This is one great benefit of a living trust. After your death, the trustee or alternate trustee, can give out the property in the trust to the beneficiaries without going to court. This avoids the cost and delay of probate. Also, using a trust is a private process, not like probate which makes the file public for anyone to look at. See our fact sheet, Questions About Probate.

Are there other ways to avoid probate?

Yes. Here are some examples:

- If 2 people own all their property together in joint tenancy, there is usually no probate. When one dies, the property automatically belongs to the survivor.
- There is no need to probate assets that name a beneficiary. For example, life insurance money goes automatically to the named beneficiary without probate. So does a bank account if a beneficiary is named.
- You can use a Transfer on Death Deed instead of probate to give your house to someone when you die. See our fact sheet, Transfer on Death Deeds.

What happens if I become unable to manage my property?

If the living trust is set up while you are competent, the trustee (or the alternate trustee) will manage the trust property if you become incompetent. The property must be managed for your benefit as long as you are alive.

IMPORTANT: You need to have a power of attorney for your property that is not in the trust. For example, an IRA cannot be put in your trust. An IRA always has to stay in your name. See our fact sheet Powers of Attorney.

Which costs more, a living trust or a will?

If you are paying for someone to help you it generally costs more to set up a living trust than to draw up a will.

- The legal fees to draft the trust papers are often high.

- A living trust only works if you transfer property to it. You usually need a lawyer to handle the transfers, especially if you transfer real estate.
- If the trustee is a financial company, it charges fees to manage the trust.

But in the long run, it may be cheaper to have a trust than a will because a will must go through the probate process.

The real question to answer is: What costs more in your situation, a living trust OR to probate your estate?

Is a living trust a good idea if I don't have many assets?

Not usually. This is because assets can be managed using a power of attorney and can be given to who you want by naming a beneficiary.

But sometimes, there may be a good reason you want money managed in a trust. A good example is if you have many people you want to give your property to at your death. This can't be done with a transfer on death deed or a beneficiary designation on your bank account.

Does a living trust protect my assets if I go into a nursing home or if I need home care?

Putting your assets into a trust can make it hard later on if you apply for Medical Assistance (MA) to pay for long-term care. For example, the state may force you to revoke (cancel) the trust, or you may not be able to get MA to pay for long-term care services, like a nursing home or home care. These possible problems are another reason to talk to a lawyer about whether a trust makes sense for you.
